Where Loneliness Lives

Supreetha Gubbala

University of New Mexico
Where Loneliness Lives
Supreetha Gubbala

There is a pit
carved into the center
of my chest
filled with swollen
moth balls,
themselves coated in dust
or leaves,
forgotten attempts
to preserve
the stored away heart.

At high noon
in mid-June,
the Orange line
readies, packed
for a saturday ball game.
Boston thaws,
inviting the warm skin of strangers
to ebb against mine,
sticking only slightly,
than peeling off at the stops.

I watch them
adjust their caps
and step off into the
rays of light veering
rarely through subway
station windows.
Relieved for space,
I exhale.
I miss them.

I jog in Sacramento
because this is what one does
in Sacramento.

Foliage is slow here,
fallen amongst rows of gentle houses in rhythm with the couples that appear so suddenly,
that the sidewalk feels infiltrated fingers wrapped around fingers, and rose gold bands

with their dogs and trees that drape over yards filled with wooden rope swings and stability.

I jog past.
I attempt a smile
Look happy
Completely satisfied
without your dog
wooden tree swing
or rose gold.

It is 2pm.
The high tide crashes in,
swirling pools of muddled foam invade my well-kept cave.
The mothballs,
they float aimlessly to the surface popping out their
white balmy, balding heads, coating me with slick discomfort.

There is no place for
this kind of ugliness
in Sacramento.

Sometimes loneliness just has to live
between tides,
and skins of arms on subways.
Only to suddenly appear as
vulgar,
bubbling
garbage
floating in clear blue waters, passing by gaping vacationers and disrupting holidays in Cancun.

An uninvited reality
between
engagement rings
and
tree swings.